Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: . the merciful King of heaven; For David, his friend, he patiently bore, Many trials and griefs unknown before. Then tis not in the gay and festive hour, Blest spirit, that thou to charm us hast power; Bright scenes may deceive, but trials alone The falsehood or faith of friends can make known. And when thou art fix d in the human heart, Though storms assail it, thou It never depart. Like insects, those frail and beautiful things, Some sport in the sunshine, like them too have wings; They bask in the light of a summer s sky, But at winter s approach they wither and die; And such, in our fortune s blight and decay, Like these gaudy insects, vanish away. O much-injur d goddess, say, shall it be, Shall heartless deceivers counterfeit thee? Shall they vilely profane thy sacred name, Of bright truth regardless, devoid of shame? Shall they practise foul arts, form d to deceive, And shall credulous mortals yet believe? O when will the fairest in virtue s train, Truth, justice, and mercy, return to reign? When will their influence on all descend, When will man become to mankind a friend? O when will he banish all pride and strife, Both the bane and the curse of social life? When will pure religion, that spotless dove, Fit him for the climes of meekness and love? The Spirit of God will then be his guest, And unrivall d reign in every breast....
